Brianna Mathias and Paul Jacobson Discuss EPA's Proposed Risk Management Program Revisions in Industry Today

Spencer Fane attorneys Brianna Mathias and Paul Jacobson's article, EPA Proposes Revisions to Risk Management Program Rules, was recently published by Industry Today.

In the article, which was originally a firm blog post, the team explores the EPA's proposed revisions to the Risk Management Program regulations and their potential impact on regulated facilities. They explain how the proposal would reshape compliance obligations while reducing regulatory burdens and costs for many businesses. The authors also outline what companies should consider as they prepare for the EPA's anticipated final rule.

"Facilities subject to the RMP regulations should continue complying with existing requirements until the rule has been finalized. Companies that invested significant resources to implement the 2024 amendments may wish to assess how the proposed revisions could affect ongoing compliance programs and future capital expenditures," the team wrote.

At the firm, Brianna provides practical, compliance-based counsel to businesses navigating both simple and complex environmental and energy law matters, with specific experience addressing regulations concerning health and safety within the mining industry.

Paul guides clients through their environmental and workplace safety challenges involving EPA, OSHA, state environmental and workplace safety agencies, and private parties.
